

HALO Disputes, Refunds and Chargebacks

Generated for HALO demo source retrieval.

Prototype note: HALO disputes content is fictional and modelled on UK current-account refund and card-dispute principles.

Dispute a charge

If the customer does not recognise a card charge, they should freeze the card first, then open the transaction in the HALO app and choose Help > I don't recognise this transaction. HALO will ask what happened and may request evidence such as receipts, merchant messages, delivery proof, or cancellation confirmation.

The customer should tell HALO as soon as possible. If the customer waits more than 13 months from the date money left the account, HALO may not be able to recover the money.

For merchant disputes, the customer should usually contact the merchant first unless fraud is suspected. HALO can raise a card chargeback where the goods or services were not received, were significantly not as described, the merchant charged twice, the merchant did not provide an agreed refund, or the final amount was higher than reasonably expected.

If a card payment was made before the final amount was known, such as a hotel, hire car, or fuel deposit, and the final amount is higher than the customer could reasonably expect, the customer should report it within 8 weeks and provide requested information.

If a Direct Debit is taken in error by HALO or the company collecting it, the customer is entitled to an immediate refund under the Direct Debit Guarantee.

HALO will usually refund unauthorised payments, payments taken after the card was frozen, and payment losses caused by HALO's own mistake, unless the customer acted fraudulently or failed to keep security details safe.